The International Human Rights Law refers to an international body of law that is designed to protect and promote human rights at different level including domestic, regional and international level. Just like any other international law, International Human Rights Law comprises of agreements and treaties between states. These agreements and treaties are intended to make binding legal impact between parties that are members to them.

Communism was the base of organization in the primitive societies. However, when states emerged the organization and power distribution became based on the law. Demand for rights and what these rights are made of grew which led to the development of the human rights law.

In human rights evolution, state emergence was a crucial development. This is because most rights are centered on the state. The state bear the duties in regards to individual person who depend in the state for protection of the human rights. When these rights are violated, individuals are allowed to claim against the state.

Human rights law offers mechanisms and tools that enhance realization of claims and protection of human rights. Customary international law refers to the rules that are derived from consistent conduct of different states that act out of belief that they are required by the law to act in that manner there are other instruments of the international human rights that contribute to their understanding, implementation and development all though they are not legally binding. These are recognized and considered as a political obligation source. International Human Rights Law can be enforced at international, regional or domestic level. Once a state ratify human rights agreements or treaties it commits itself to representing them and ensuring that it has a domestic law that is compatible with the international legislation.
